Storm Jaxon hated Captain Sküljagger.

Hated him, pure and simple.

The reason was easy. For ten years, Sküljagger had ruled the island of Westica with all the cruelty in his Kiltish heart.

For ten long years, Sküljagger had forced proud Westicans to work like slaves in their own jemerald mines.

For ten long and deadly years, he had silenced anyone who opposed him... with one swing of a Kiltish battle-axe.

Ten years was enough of Sküljagger.

As far as Storm was concerned, the time had come for things to change.

The time had come for Westica to be free again.

1 the SWORD

Storm Jaxon ducked behind a barrel, crouched down, and got ready to strike. He knew it was a crazy plan. He knew that one wrong step would land him in Sküljagger's savage grip.

But he wanted that sword.

From his hiding place, Storm had a perfect view of Gauntlet Grounds—the giant field where Sküljagger trained his Kiltish troops for battle. The sword was sitting on a brown crate, near the edge of the trampled grass.

Its golden handle flashed once in the morning sun.

"Sküljagger's sword," Storm muttered, shaking his head. "I must be insane." As usual, Storm was chewing a chunk of homemade gum. He blew a snap-cherry bubble, popped it, and gazed at the Captain's sword. "It's just begging for a new owner."

Storm watched Sküljagger march around the field, shouting at his troops. The Kiltish Army was the largest, fiercest force in the world—and Sküljagger was the Army's fiercest Captain. Storm could see the cruel glint in Sküljagger's one good eye.

"I've heard that some foolish Westicans are talking about revolution," Sküljagger shouted. He threw his head back in laughter. "Ha! What a delicious joke! I'd love nothing more than to crush the Westicans—crush them like pathetic bugs—then feed the left-overs to the battle-dogs. How does that sound, my mighty steel-masked men?"

The warriors lifted their rifles and shouted their infamous battle cry. It was a high-pitched scream—like the sound of a war-crazed, two-headed Kiltish battle-dog.

Storm felt a cold line of sweat run down his side. At any moment, Sküljagger could turn and march back to his sword.

It was now or never.

"Ingawa!" Storm whispered, then surged across the rocky ground. He grabbed the handle and pulled the sword free. The fine silver blade vibrated in his hand like a living being.

Storm smiled, gripped the golden handle tighter, and took off running.

After only three steps, though, Storm felt his boot catch on a hidden root. He tripped forward and smashed the sword against an empty metal barrel. The barrel thundered like a Chinese gong—and Storm tumbled to the ground.

Sküljagger spun around, his good eye blazing fire. Every Kiltish warrior cocked his rifle.

Storm snatched the sword from the dirt and leaped to his feet.

"Crush that foolish cockroach!" Sküljagger screamed. "I must have that sword back. I must!"

Storm sprinted toward an old pier, pumping his arms like mad. The sound of the Kiltish battle cry pierced the morning air, and an icy chill shot up Storm's spine.

"Whatever you do, don't choke now," he said to himself.

Storm knew the city of Tuscamech like the back of his hand. He had lived in the Westican capital all his life, and knew every house, every factory, and every winding street by heart. If he could make it across these bridges and piers, he'd end up at old

Mr. Roop's warehouse. If he was lucky, maybe he could lose the Kiltish in there.

But if he wasn't lucky....

Sküljagger pulled a long pistol from his belt. He took aim at Storm's back, and a gruesome grin crossed his face.

"This'll teach that Westican worm to touch my sword."

A shot rang out, and Storm heard the bullet whiz past his ear—exploding a crate just beside his head. He leaped across a hole in the old wooden pier, then sailed over a barrel like a jungle cat.

Storm glanced over his shoulder. The Kiltish warriors were gaining on him.

"I must have that sword!" Sküljagger screamed, reloading his pistol. "Fire at him, fire!"

Storm ducked down between a small brown crate and a big yellow barrel, just as twenty rifle-shots ripped through the air. The hail of bullets turned the crate into pulp, showering Storm with shreds of wood.

"Whoa!" Storm cried, looking down at a hole that a bullet had torn in his shirt. "Was that close or what?!"

A sudden burst of energy rushed through his body, and Storm sprinted off—faster than he ever thought he could. He jumped, dodged bullets, and leaped from pier to pier. Soon the Kiltish warriors lagged behind, slowed by their masks and heavy armor. Storm jumped onto an old stone bridge, looked over his shoulder, and grinned.

He was almost starting to like this.

"Sound the general alarm!" Sküljagger yelled, cupping his mouth with both hands. His eye flamed with rage as Storm grew smaller and smaller. "Call out every Kiltish fighter in Tuscamesh." Sküljagger pointed one long, crooked red finger at Storm's back. "I want that worm's head brought to me on a silver platter!"

"Sound the general alarm!" the Kiltish warriors repeated.

A moment later, Storm heard the alarm bell ringing from the tallest tower in town. In a moment, every Kiltish warrior, sailor, and Black-Mask would be scouring the streets of Tuscamesh.

One thing was sure, Storm didn't want to meet any Black-Masks. They were Sküljagger's personal guard—fiercely loyal, and highly-trained in the martial arts. Only those who had advanced beyond the black-belt stage of training were awarded the honor of a Kiltish black-mask. It was rumored that a Black-Mask could out-think, out-punch, and out-kick even the most deadly martial masters of the world.

Storm crossed the final bridge, and sprinted toward Mr. Roop's warehouse. He remembered a small secret window, hidden in a back room of the ancient building. If he could make it to the window, he stood a chance of getting out alive.

But the streets were already crawling with Kiltish.

He raced across the road, jumped onto a chain, and swung through an open window—right into the heart of the warehouse.

"He's in the warehouse!" a Kiltish sailor called.

"Company Blitz, take the front! Company Ravage, the back!"

"Swing your chains, and take no prisoners!"

Storm scurried away from the window, leaned back against a wall, and tried to catch his breath. It felt like the entire Kiltish Empire was after him. He glanced down at the gold and silver sword in his hand.

"I hope you're worth the trouble," Storm muttered—as if the sword could hear him.

Next, he turned a corner and entered a giant room filled with barrels, crates, and boxes. He rushed toward a stairway at the end of the room—leaping and dodging over obstacles along the way. But as he got closer to the stairway, he heard Kiltish boots pounding up the steps.

He stopped short and spun around, trapped.

"There he is!"

"Don't let the insect escape!"

Kiltish sailors were blocking every door. They rushed toward Storm, swinging skull-chains that whistled in the air.

There was only one way out. Storm scrambled up a ladder, jumped onto a stack of six dark brown crates, and smashed open a secret window with the sword-handle. He shimmied out—tearing his pants on the broken glass—and slid down the rain gutter with one arm.

"He's down there!" the sailors shouted, too big to fit through the window. Their faces flushed red with fury.

"I need to get to the old part of town," Storm said, his chest heaving. "And I need to get there now."

The old part of Tuscamesh was a maze of thin alleys and curving streets. Even some Westicans got lost in the labyrinthine passageways. If he could make it to the old town, he was sure he could lose the Kiltish.

He knew a short-cut across some old bridges.

"Too late to worry about safety," Storm muttered, as he turned and sprinted toward an old bridge, leaping over a sign that read: "DANGER! BAD BRIDGES! KEEP OFF! DANGER!"

Storm caught a glimpse of something black in the distance ahead. It ducked behind a barrel, then disappeared like the shadow of a blade.

"Uh-oh," Storm said, his heart sinking. "A Black-Mask."

He ran forward carefully, ready to swing the sword. Suddenly a black blur appeared out of nowhere, chopping rock-hard arms and slicing the air. Storm screamed and ducked his head. The Black-Mask's bladed foot missed his neck by an inch.

The Black-Mask landed in ready position—hands up, legs apart, shoulders hunched. They squared-off, circling and staring daggers at each other's eyes.

Suddenly the Black-Mask exploded into action. He spun around and sliced the air into pieces, screaming a high-pitched scream. Storm ducked, and the Black-Mask's foot-blade tore his shirt.

"You're quick, for a kid," the Black-Mask said.

At that, Storm attacked, swinging the sword with all his might. The Black-Mask jumped, dodged the blade, and landed near the edge of the bridge. But one foot landed on a loose stone, and the Black-Mask lost his balance.

Storm saw his chance and moved like lightning. He grabbed a brown keg and heaved it forward. The keg knocked the Black-Mask backward—and over the edge of the bridge.

By the time the Black-Mask splashed into the water—far, far below—Storm had already spun and sprinted off.

He ran into the winding streets of the old town, past farmers pushing carts of snap-cherries, purple sea-grapes, green island-limes, and tasty Westican-oranges. Storm used those fruits to flavor his homemade bubble gum, and all the merchants knew him by name. He passed tired Westican workers on their way to the jemerlald mines. He smelled the warm smell of Westican bread rising from Pym's Bakery.

And there wasn't a single Kiltish warrior in sight.

Storm smiled. He stopped running, and strolled across the stone bridge that led toward home.

"I don't believe it," Storm said to himself, smiling and shaking his head. "I just stole Sküljagger's sword."

As he walked through the winding streets, Storm thought about Captain Sküljagger.

He would never forget the day that Sküljagger sailed his battle fleet into Tuscameh Harbor. Even though Storm had been very young at the time, he could still remember the sound of Kiltish cannonballs ripping through the air. He could remember his first glimpse of Sküljagger, too—a giant man with a scalded skull, laughing as he slashed his way down Bladeback Street.

Storm's mother had been killed that day. She had been a doctor at a Westican hospital. The hospital had been destroyed by cannon-fire from Sküljagger's own personal battleship.

Sküljagger's force crushed Westica in less than a day. From then on, Westica was no longer a proud, free nation—as it had been for a thousand years. It was just another, tiny part of the mighty Kiltish Empire.

Worse yet, it was Sküljagger's part.

Storm gripped the sword tighter in his hands. As far as he was concerned, Sküljagger deserved whatever he got.

Storm caught a glimpse of his house in the distance. Another two-hundred yards and he'd be home, safe and sound.

"Halt, worm!" a voice shouted.

A pistol shot rang out, and a bullet smashed through a window beside Storm's head.

It was Sküljagger. The Captain was running at full speed, his purple cape flowing out behind him like a sinister wing.

"Give up, you miserable scum-worm!" Sküljagger shouted.

Storm ducked into a side-alley, and ran for his life. He needed a plan, and he needed one fast.

That's when he saw ten rain barrels, lined up in a row along the thin winding alley.

He jumped inside the last barrel and ducked his head, just as Sküljagger turned down the alley.

"You're crazy if you think you can escape!" Sküljagger cried, looking down the empty alley-way. "You stinking pond-scum!"

Storm listened to Sküljagger's heavy steps. They grew closer and closer, until they stopped right beside the barrel. Storm held his breath. A silence fell that seemed to last forever. Then—at last—the footsteps started up again, moved away, and disappeared down another alley.

Storm let out a quiet sigh of relief. He reached out of the barrel and tapped the sword against the closest window.

"Who is it?" a voice asked from inside.

"It's me," Storm whispered. "Let me in, fast!"

"Storm!" the young man shouted, yanking open the window and looking down. "What are you doing in the rain barrel?"

"Shut up!" Storm said, handing him the sword. "Just grab the sword and help me in."

It was Storm's best friend. His real name was R.L. Wright, but everyone called him Wits.

Basically, Wits was a genius. His bedroom looked like the laboratory of a mad scientist—with wires, test tubes, and strange concoctions covering his desk, and complicated diagrams tacked onto his walls. Wits knew how to make the finest crossbows in Westica, using twine from the bark of the finger-tree. He knew how to weave rope from the vines of the moss-plant. And, to top it off, he was almost as much of a daredevil as Storm.

Wits snatched the sword, dropped it to the floor, and pulled Storm through the window.

"Ingawa!" Storm said, jumping to his feet.

"Ingawa!" Wits answered.

The two friends raised their hands in the air and slammed them together. The "ingawa" was their secret greeting.

Only one other person in the world knew the "ingawa"—and that person was Trina Wright, Wits' half-sister. Trina knew the Westican jungle as well as Storm or Wits, and was the best crossbow shooter Storm had ever met.

"I thought I heard your voice, Storm," Trina said, ducking into the room and giving Storm a quick ingawa. Right away, Trina spotted the shining sword.

"What is that?" she asked.

"Ahem." Storm cleared his throat, as if getting ready for the announcement of the year. "It's Sküljagger's sword."

"Sküljagger's sword?" Wits and Trina said at the exact same time.

Trina turned pale. "You mean you stole it?"

Storm nodded.

Trina rushed over and slammed the shutters closed. Wits locked the door and leaned his back against it, breathing hard.

"This is serious," Trina said in a whisper.

"Did he see your face?" Wits asked.

"Not a chance," Storm answered proudly. "The only thing Sküljagger saw was my back."

Wits broke into a little grin, and shook his head. "I can't believe you actually did it!" he said, excited. "INGAWA!"

"But haven't you heard the rumors?" Trina asked.

"What rumors?" Storm asked.

"It's supposed to be a magic sword," Trina answered. "I've heard that Sküljagger found it in a jemerald mine. Some people even say Sküljagger talks to it."

"Magic sword, hah!" Storm laughed. "No such thing."

"Easy, smart guy," Wits said. "There are plenty of weird things in the world." He started counting things off on his fingers. "There are power stones and inexplicable force-fields and maybe even ghosts. Just yesterday I was studying an ancient cliff-face near the beach. It had strange writing all over it—and it wasn't Westican writing, either. Where did it come from? A lost civilization?" Wits shrugged. "So who knows, maybe the sword is magic."

Storm leaped to his feet and swiped the sword through the air.

"Dear magic sword," he said, talking into the handle, "Please make me a huge breakfast of bladeback steaks and bread. And while you're at it, let me blow magic flavor bubbles that make me fly."

Storm waited a moment—and nothing happened. Wits and Trina couldn't help but laugh.

"So much for magic swords," Storm said.

Still, it was an incredible sword. There was a big hole in the blade, right near the handle—where a jewel might have been. Right below the hole was a tiny inscription, which read, "LDL DRU."

"I'm starting to get a feeling," Trina said. "A strong feeling."

"Uh-oh," Storm said.

For as long as Storm could remember, Trina had gotten strange feelings whenever something big was about to happen. It was as if she had an amazing sixth sense.

"I've got a feeling that Sküljagger is going to cancel Mask Day," Trina said. "All because of this sword."

"What?!" Wits exclaimed. "Sküljagger isn't that stupid.

If he cancels Mask Day, he'll have a riot on his hands."

"I wouldn't put anything past Sküljagger," Trina said.

Storm looked down at the sword in his hands. He knew that Wits was right. If Sküljagger actually cancelled Mask Day, there would be big trouble.

There would be revolution.

And Mask Day was tomorrow.

The people of Westica lived for Mask Day.

It was the one day of the year when they didn't have to work in the jemer-ald mines. It was the one, single, solitary day of the year when Sküljagger actually let them celebrate.

On Mask Day, everyone wore bright green masks made of bone, straw, and painted wood. According to tradition, anyone who wore a mask on Mask Day became completely invisible. All day and all night, the Westicans sang, feasted on roasted bladeback, and danced through the streets of Tuscamesh. Storm's favorite part of Mask Day was the story-telling contest, where old men told tales of how happy Westica had been—before Sküljagger came.

Later that day, Storm heard the news.

"Hear ye, hear ye!" the Kiltish warriors shouted. "By order of Captain Sküljagger, there will be no Mask Day! And any Westican caught wearing a mask will be shot on sight!"

Storm's heart began to pound like crazy his chest. Trina had been right. There was going to be big trouble.

And Storm was the cause of it all.

2 ^{the} REVOLUTION

Storm sneaked down the steps like a thief, careful not to make a sound. He could hear the voices, rising and falling like angry waves.

Storm's father had ordered him to stay in his room and read. But this was a top-secret meeting—and Storm wouldn't have missed it for the world.

"Keep it down!" someone said. "If a Kiltish guard hears us, we're history!"

Storm hid behind a workbench, and peered into his father's locksmith shop. Twenty men were gathered around the workbenches, their faces glowing in the dim candlelight. The air inside was tense and still.

Storm had never seen his father so angry in all his life.

"It's the last straw!" Coe Jaxon said, slamming his fist on his workbench. "Sküljagger can't just cancel Mask Day!"

Everyone grumbled in agreement.

"For ten years," his father continued, "Sküljagger has treated us like dirt. He's forced us to work like slaves in the jemer-ald mines. And then he takes all of our jemer-alds, packs them onto ships, and sends them off to the Kiltish King."

"And we're left with nothing," someone said. "Nothing!"

"Those jemer-alds are ours, not his," Coe Jaxon said, getting angrier and angrier. "They came from our island. And they should stay on our island."

All his life, Storm had heard his father talk about Westica's incredible jemer-alds. He knew that jemer-alds were the most valuable stones on earth—far more valuable than diamonds or rubies. He also knew that the small island of Westica had more jemer-alds than the rest of the world put together.

Unfortunately, the Kiltish King had a big thing for jemer-alds. And that's why—ten years earlier—he had sent Captain Lucius Khan Sküljagger to conquer Westica and gain control of her jemer-ald mines.

"Cancelling Mask Day is the last straw," Coe Jaxon said. "It's time to do something about the Kiltish."

"But what can we do?" someone asked.

"I've got a plan," Coe Jaxon answered. "And it has to do with jemer-alds."

It was the most amazing plan Storm had ever heard. His heart began to thump with excitement, and a little grin curled the edges of his mouth.

The next night, at midnight, the men would put on their Mask Day masks. Then they'd sneak onto a certain Kiltish ship—the one where all the jemer-alds were kept. And then... they'd dump every single jemer-ald into Tuscamesh Harbor.

"Millions of duckets of Westican jemer-alds," Coe Jaxon said, "Dumped to the bottom of Tuscamesh Harbor! At least that way, every Westican jemer-ald will stay in Westica. Even if they are at the bottom of the sea!"

Coe Jaxon pounded his hammer against the white-hot metal, sending up a shower of bright sparks.

"Absolutely not," he said, lifting the hammer and smashing it down again. "You cannot come along tonight."

It was the next evening, and Storm was standing in the locksmith shop. His father was at the forge, fixing a broken padlock. Storm watched his father's powerful arms flex in the glowing orange light.

"First of all," Coe Jaxon went on, "Those are secret plans. You should not have been eavesdropping on our meeting.

And second of all, you're too young to come along."

"But you don't get it, Dad," Storm answered. "I've got to come along. I've got to help out..."

"This is serious business, Storm," Coe Jaxon responded. "Sküljagger said he'd shoot anyone caught wearing a mask. Anything can happen out there tonight."

Coe Jaxon put his hands on Storm's shoulders and looked him straight in the eye. "When your mother died, I promised I'd keep you safe. Remember, you're my one and only son. You're all I've got."

"But I can..." Storm began.

"That's it," his father answered firmly, turning back to the forge. The hammer fell again, sending sparks into the air. When Coe Jaxon spoke, his word was final.

Wits looked up from his workbench, and gave Storm a shrug. Storm just shook his head. How could his father expect him to miss out on the most amazing night in Westican history?

Storm and Wits worked together in Jaxon's Locksmith

Shop. Storm's great-great-grandfather had founded the shop, over a hundred years before. Before Sküljagger came, Coe Jaxon had been the finest locksmith in Westica. Now, he spent his days swinging a pick in the jemerald mines—while Storm and Wits did their best to keep the shop afloat.

"Dad's crazy," Storm muttered angrily, sitting back down at his workbench. "I've got to go along."

Storm snatched up his hammer and got back to work.

"Hey, Storm," Wits said, when Coe Jaxon had left the workshop. "I want to show you something."

Wits walked over and handed Storm an orange ball. Storm could tell it was Wits' newest scientific experiment.

"Don't drop it," Wits said. "It's a homemade hand grenade."

"You're kidding," Storm said, slipping his other hand beneath the grenade. "What's it made out of?"

"You combine homemade bubble gum with the crushed skins of oranges, then add the right amount of extract from the brain of the giant insect," Wits said. "If my theory is right, the stuff should explode on impact. And I mean really explode. I haven't tested it yet, but..."

Just then Coe Jaxon walked back into the workshop, and Wits hurried back to his bench. Storm opened up his workbench drawer and hid the grenade inside.

Sküljagger's sword was sitting in there too, beneath some papers and an old white shirt. Earlier that day, Storm had sneaked the sword in without anyone noticing.

The sword glinted in the dim workshop light, and the orange grenade sat right beside it.

Storm grinned.

"I got us into all this trouble," he muttered, "And I plan to help get us out."

At five minutes before midnight, Coe Jaxon came down the steps with his mask in his hand. It was a fine green mask, topped with bone and straw hair. Usually, the sight of a mask made Storm think of dancing and stories and juicy bladeback steaks.

But tonight, the mask made him think of revolution.

Coe Jaxon put his hand on Storm's shoulder.

"Big things are happening, Storm," he said. "I'm almost glad Sküljagger cancelled Mask Day. Because now, we Westicans are finally standing up for the things we believe in. Things like freedom and liberty."

Storm looked down at the floor. His father didn't speak this way very often.

"It's going to be dangerous out there tonight," he went on. "Some of us may not come back. But whatever happens, Storm, always remember... we did what was right."

Storm thought he saw his father's eyes clouding up. Coe Jaxon quickly slipped on his mask.

"And, Storm," he added, "I want you in your room tonight. Period."

He slammed the door, and disappeared into the darkness.

Storm always thought twice before he went against his father's word. In fact, there was nothing that Storm dreaded as much as getting in trouble with his father.

But tonight, it was worth the risk.

Storm ran upstairs and pulled an old mask from his closet. He put on some old clothes that he hadn't worn in years, and snatched a hatchet from his father's workbench.

This was one night Storm was not going to miss.

Before he rushed out the door, Storm pulled Wits' hand grenade from his workbench drawer, and slid it in his pocket. Then he grabbed a fresh piece of home-made gum, took a sip of island-lime juice, and blew a huge green bubble.

"In this get-up, Dad will never know it's me," Storm said, as he closed the door behind him.

Storm rushed through the darkened streets, keeping an eye out for Kiltish warriors. Finally he came to the wharf where the jemerald ship was docked.

"Ingawa!" Storm said, stopping in his tracks and gazing at the scene that spread out before him.

All the Kiltish sailors were tied to the masts, with gags in their mouths so they couldn't make a sound. Men in green masks moved silently across the ship's deck, swinging orange torches and searching for crates of Westican jemeralds.

Storm smiled and sprinted toward the action.

Storm lifted his hatchet high above his head, and smashed open another wooden crate. The bright green jemeralds—worth millions of duckets—shone and glistened in the torchlight. Grunting, Storm lifted up the crate and heaved it over the railing. The crate hit the water with a splash.

Tuscamesh Harbor was already covered with wood from demolished crates. A whole ship-load of jemeralds was sitting at the bottom of the Harbor. There'd be a real mess in the morning.

That is, if they lived to see the morning.

"Faster, men, faster!" Coe Jaxon called out.

Across the water, the HMS Destruction was coming to life. The Captain of the Destruction had noticed strange movements on the distant jemerald ship. Storm could see the Kiltish cannons gleaming in the moonlight, and sailors running to battlestations on the deck.

Storm was just about to smash open a bright red crate—which had the words "Downwright Jemerald Cutters" stamped on its top—when he heard a familiar voice.

"You there," Coe Jaxon called, pointing right at Storm. "Help me pull up these crates. It's the last load!"

Storm slid his hatchet into his belt and ran across the deck. His father, and three other rebels, were pulling on a rope, trying to lift the last crates of jemeralds through the huge opening that led deep into the belly of the ship. The men's bright masks shone in the torchlight. Storm grabbed the end of the rope and pulled with all his might.

"Heave!" the men grunted, pulling on the rope.

When the load was almost to the top, the rope suddenly snapped and Storm and all the men fell back in a heap. The jemeralds crashed down into the hole, with a gigantic "BOOOOOM!"

The sound echoed through the night, like a cannon-blast. Lights flashed on in windows all over Tuscamech.

So much for secrecy.

"In one minute, this place'll be swarming with Killish!" someone shouted. "Everyone off the ship!"

"Not yet!" Coe Jaxon answered. "We can't leave a single jemerald behind!"

"But we don't have time!" someone answered.

Storm saw the broken rope, hanging right above the dark hole that led below deck. Suddenly, he knew exactly what to do.

He took a running leap, snatched the rope, and dropped straight down—right into the deepest part of the ship.

Storm hit the crates of jemeralds and tumbled to the damp floor, gasping for breath. Before he could move, he felt a warm hairy thing run across his face.

"Snap-rats!" Storm shouted, leaping to his feet. Suddenly a sharp tail whipped against Storm's leg, and he screamed in pain. He kicked wildly at the snap-rats with his boots.

"Forget the snap-rats," Coe Jaxon called from above. "Just tie that rope onto those crates, and get out of there!"

Storm took a look around. The hold was dimly-lit, and seemed to stretch on forever. In the distance, he noticed six green jemerald boxes that had been left behind.

"We can't leave a single jemerald on the ship," Storm whispered, clenching his fists. "Not a single jemerald for Skuljagger's King!"

Storm took off running, leaping over snap-rats and barrels. He climbed to the top of the six green boxes, blew a bubble, and looked around the hold for more jemerald crates. But there was nothing—just empty barrels and crates filled with cotton. So he jumped down, picked up the jemerald crates, and lugged them over to the hole.

Storm heard a bell ring out above, and his blood ran cold.

"They just rang the general alarm!" Coe Jaxon shouted. "Whoever you are, work fast! The Kiltish are coming!"

Storm let his hands take over. He had tied sailor's knots so many times that he could do it in his sleep. He yanked the knot tight. Then he stood on a purple jemerald crate, jumped on it three times for good luck, and blew another bubble.

"Lift me up," he called, trying to make his voice sound different. "And hurry!"

Storm heard the men grunt as they pulled the rope, then felt the load of jemeralds lift off the floor. His knot seemed to be holding, and he rose higher and higher into the torch light.

When Storm got to the upper deck, his father reached out and yanked him off the crates. Most of the Westicans had already disappeared into the city. The HMS Destruction was sailing full-speed, her cannons ready to fire. Storm could hear Kiltish warriors running toward them through the darkened streets of Tuscamesh.

"You're a real hero, whoever you are," Coe Jaxon said to Storm. "Now, GET OUT OF HERE—FAST!"

Coe Jaxon leaped off the ship—and Storm was just about to follow—when the HMS Destruction fired off two giant cannon shots. The balls whistled through the air and exploded in the water—soaking Storm to the bone.

Storm noticed three small cannons on the deck. He knew he should run... but he couldn't resist taking a few pot-shots at the Destruction. He ran to the first cannon, aimed, and fired. The shot sailed into the night—trailing a tail of fire—then ripped through the massive sails of the Destruction. Storm could hear Kiltish sailors shouting in outrage, and he raised his arms in triumph.

But it was a short triumph. After firing two more rounds, Storm heard Kiltish warriors boarding the jemerald ship.

"There's one!" they shouted, pointing at Storm. "Don't let the vermin escape!"

Rifle shots rang out. Storm ducked behind a barrel, and bullets splintered the wood all around him. He took off running across the deck. When he glanced behind, five warriors were on his tail and gaining fast.

Another round of shots cracked in the air and a bullet ripped through the pocket of Storm's old pants. Wits' home-made gum grenade almost fell to the ground, but Storm grabbed it at the last second. In all the confusion, Storm had forgotten about the grenade.

But he sure did need it now.

"Let's hope your experiment works, Wits," Storm said, tossing the grenade over his shoulder at the charging warriors.

A giant explosion ripped through the night. The impact tossed Storm over the rail of the ship and across the water. He tumbled to the dock, did a somersault, and landed on his feet. Without missing a stride, he turned and sprinted down a dark, winding alley.

"Good work, Wits!" Storm thought. "I owe you one!"

For five full minutes, the Kiltish chased him through the streets and alleys of Tuscamesh. They screamed at him, swung chains at him, and shot at him. But Storm knew Tuscamesh like the back of his hand.

He ducked into an alley near his house, and scrambled up the gutter to the roof—just as a unit of Kiltish warriors marched by. Storm peered around a chimney, watching them pass.

The warriors were leading someone down the street at gun-point. The man had a blindfold around his eyes, and his hands were tied behind his back. The Kiltish pushed him forward, and the man tumbled to the street.

Storm saw the prisoner's face, and gasped.
It was his father.

Late that night, Storm was laying awake in bed. In his mind, he watched the Kiltish warriors push his father to the ground—over and over again. Now that his father had been captured, what would the Kiltish do with him? Would they keep him in prison forever? Would they hang him?

The house and locksmith shop were very dark, very quiet. The streets of Tuscamech were quiet, too—except for a shutter that banged in the wind, and the bats that whistled around his window.

Suddenly he heard a voice—deep and low—somewhere in the locksmith shop downstairs.

Storm's eyes widened with fear. Knowing that his father would never have hidden beneath the covers, Storm grabbed his hatchet, crawled out of bed, and walked slowly downstairs. Beads of cold sweat broke out on his forehead.

"Who's there?" he said, entering the locksmith shop.
Silence.

"Wits, is that you?" Storm asked, his voice cracking. "This isn't funny... Trina?"

When Storm heard the voice again, he knew it wasn't Wits or Trina. The voice seemed to be saying something, but Storm couldn't understand it. It seemed to be coming from somewhere near his workbench. He walked over, grabbed his workbench drawer, and yanked it open.

A blinding golden light shone forth from the drawer, and Storm flew back, guarding his eyes.

It was the sword.

Storm inched closer and closer, his mouth open with amazement.

And then the sword spoke, in a voice as deep as the ocean.

"Do not be afraid, Storm," the sword said.

Storm rubbed his eyes to make sure he wasn't seeing things. But the sword was still there, glowing in his workbench drawer.

"Pick me up," the sword commanded.
"And do not be afraid."

Storm reached his hand into the drawer. He grasped the sword by the handle, then slowly lifted it. The sword felt warm in his hand, as if it were alive. Its light shone only on Storm's face, leaving the rest of the shop in darkness.

"I am a sword of great power," the sword said. "But you, Storm, can never earn my true power—unless you find a red jernerald, and place it in the hole in my blade."

"But how do I find one?" Storm whispered.

"You must prove yourself worthy of one," the sword answered. "And when you have proven yourself worthy, you will find a red jernerald—and gain my power.
That is my promise."

Storm shook his head, perplexed. "Who are you?" he asked.

"I am a wise and ancient soul," the sword said. "Listen to my story, Storm. Listen and learn...."

NOTCA RUOY ELBUOD OT SRETTUC DLAREMEJ EHT
TUOBA KNIHT, ENOZ YBATNAF A OTN I GNILLAF NEHW

Storm did listen to the sword's story. And it was the most amazing story he had ever heard.

"Many thousands of years ago, I was the King of a mighty nation called Urnum," the sword told Storm that night. "We were a nation with amazing weapons—plasma-blasters, missiles, and battleships the size of small islands. I ruled half the world, and wanted more."

"But why are you trapped in this sword?" Storm asked.

"I led my people to destruction," the sword answered, with sadness in its voice. "And, as punishment, I was sentenced to live inside a sword."

Storm also learned—to his amazement—that the ruins of Urnum were hidden somewhere on the island of Westica. And that the ruins still contained Urnum's powerful weapons.

"Does Sküljagger know about the weapons?" Storm asked.

"Yes," answered the sword. "But since Captain Sküljagger never earned a red jernerald—and therefore never won my full and true power—he has not yet found the ruins of Urnum." The sword paused. "And—for the good of the whole world—let us hope he never does."

Storm agreed. If Sküljagger ever got his hands on the weapons of Urnum, the entire world would soon be his.

3 SKÜLJAGGER'S PRISON

"I'm totally serious, Wits!" Storm shouted. "It is a magic sword—just like Trina said."

"Yeah, right," Wits answered with a laugh. "And I can bounce around inside giant bubbles."

It was the next morning, and the two friends had just opened the locksmith shop. Wits was at the forge, pounding white-hot metal. But Storm couldn't concentrate on his work at all. All he could think about was his missing father—and the amazing sword.

"If you don't believe me," Storm said, "Then just check this out." He yanked open his workbench drawer, and pulled out the sword. Its silver blade caught the bright morning sun. "This sword talks, Wits. I'm not kidding. It's the voice of an ancient King, the King of Urnum, and Urnum was this Kingdom with incredible weapons and...."

Wits turned and walked toward Storm, wearing a worried expression. He put his hand on Storm's forehead.

"You must have a fever," Wits said, looking into Storm's eyes. "Have you been bitten by any poisonous insects recently? Were you hit on the head last night?"

Storm slapped Wits' hand away.

Just then, a shadow passed across the wall and the two friends spun their heads to the window.

"Sküljagger!" Wits screamed.

"He's coming this way!"

Storm didn't have time think. He yanked open his workbench drawer, and flung the sword inside, just as Sküljagger came storming through the door.

"Greetings, vermin!" Sküljagger said. He slammed the door and walked right up to Storm. For a moment, he just stood there—so close that Storm could feel the Captain's hot breath. His bloodshot eye stared into Storm, like a single deadly dagger.

"Tell me, boy," Sküljagger whispered, pointing toward Storm's workbench. "What did you just hide in that drawer? Hmm?"

"N-Nothing," Storm answered.

"NOTHING?!" Sküljagger screamed, grabbing Storm by the collar and lifting him off the ground. "Don't lie to me, you insect! I could feed you to the battle-dogs!"

Sküljagger dropped Storm and pulled open the workbench drawer. Wits was standing by the forge, his eyes wide with terror. Storm got ready to kiss himself goodbye.

"What have we here?" Sküljagger asked, reaching into the drawer.

He pulled out a gnarly branch, covered with twigs and leaves. Storm and Wits could hardly believe their eyes. The sword had saved their skins.

Sküljagger hurled the branch to the floor in anger. Then he picked Storm up again, and pinned him high against the wall. Storm's boots were two feet off the floor. He could barely breathe.

"Your father—Coe Jaxon—is my prisoner," Sküljagger said. "He was one of the bug-brains who dumped all my lovely jemeralds into Tuscamesh Harbor last night. And unless you tell me everything you know, I will eliminate your father. And I will eliminate him tonight! Do you understand, boy?"

"But I don't...," Storm began.

"Shut up!" Sküljagger cried. "Just tell me how many Westicans are gathering at the lighthouse."

"I don't know," Storm answered truthfully.

"THAT'S NOT GOOD ENOUGH!"

Sküljagger screamed, lifting Storm even higher. "I've heard reports that five hundred Westicans are gathering at the lighthouse near the village of Siksup. And they're planning to put up a fight—against the mighty Sküljagger!"

"I don't know anything," Storm said, gasping for breath.

Sküljagger snarled but let Storm drop to the floor. He slowly straightened his collar, and pulled his gloves onto his long, bony fingers. Then he smiled a slow and evil grin.

"Six hours," Sküljagger said. "Six hours is all your father has left to live. And not a second more."

The Captain laughed, then spun around and left, slamming the door behind him.

Later that morning, Storm, Wits and Trina held a secret meeting in the locksmith shop. Storm was pacing back and forth across the floor, lost in thought. He knew they needed a plan. If they didn't do something—and do something fast—his father was history.

But how could they rescue him in time?

"I've got a plan!" Storm said at last. "Grab your crossbows and follow me."

Storm snatched the sword, and headed confidently for the door. Trina and Wits followed behind.

But the truth was, Storm didn't have a plan.

It was typical Storm Jaxon. Just start doing something—and a plan would soon develop.

The three friends sneaked through the alleys and out of Tuscamesh. Sküljagger's prison was deep in the jungles of Westica. A road cut through the jungle and went straight to the prison. The only problem was, the road was patrolled by Kiltish warriors and Black-Masks.

"I know a secret path," Wits said, leading them forward. "I use it when I hunt for bats and giant insects. It's the best way to Sküljagger's prison. But watch out for bladebacks."

The path went through the deepest, most dangerous part of the jungle. The bright Westican sun shone through the leaves, making shifting patterns on the jungle floor. Occasionally, they heard the strange cry of a claw-bird in the distance, echoing off the sharp hills.

"Keep quiet," Wits said. "Kiltish patrols are everywhere. If we make too much noise, we'll be ambushed for sure."

Storm heard a branch snap in the trees, and stopped cold. He gripped his sword more tightly. Wits yanked an arrow from his quiver. Trina crouched down, her crossbow ready to fire.

For a moment, the jungle was quiet. Nothing could be heard but the faraway cry of a claw-bird.

"Bladebacks!" Storm screamed.

Two wild beasts came crashing through the underbrush. They charged at the three friends, their sharp tusks leading the way. The bladebacks had razor-sharp fins all along their backs—fins which could slice through bone.

"Storm, behind you!" Wits shouted.

Storm spun around just as a third bladeback leaped into the air. He swung his sword and caught the bladeback in the shoulder. The wounded beast charged ahead and smashed into Storm's chest, knocking him down between a rock and a giant coconut. Storm's sword fell from his hand and the angry bladeback charged again.

Just then a shot rang out.

The bladebacks—terrified of gunfire—stopped in their tracks. When another shot cracked through the jungle, the bladebacks turned and fled, screaming as they went.

"Who shot the guns?" Storm asked, climbing to his feet. He had a bad feeling in his gut.

Just then a bullet deflected off a branch right beside Trina's head, and the three friends hit the dirt.

"It's a Kiltish patrol!" Trina said. "They heard us!"

It was out of the frying pan, and into the fire.

"Run!" Storm shouted.

They leaped forward and sprinted across the jungle floor. Storm could see two warriors up ahead, their steel-masks glinting in the sun. The warriors disappeared behind the trees.

Trina loaded her crossbow as she ran.

A shot suddenly ripped through Storm's shirt, grazing his skin. He yanked his head around and saw a steel-masked face, not more than twenty feet away. The warrior charged, his bayonet leading the way like a battle lance.

Storm knocked the bayonet away with a sword-swipe and the sound of metal meeting metal echoed through the trees. The warrior swung for Storm's head, but Storm ducked and leaped to the side.

"Pretty quick, boy," the warrior laughed.

Storm swiped his sword, swinging with all his might. The warrior deflected the blade with a quick, effortless spin. But as the warrior turned to strike back, he fell off balance. Storm saw his opportunity, and finished off the warrior with a single swipe.

But he didn't have time to rest.

"Help!" Wits called. "I'm trapped!"

Storm spun around. Wits had fallen into a bladeback trap, and his boot was pinned in the trap's metal jaws. Wits couldn't move an inch. Storm saw the second Kiltish warrior burst from the jungle and bring his rifle to his shoulder.

Wits shouted in helpless terror, as the warrior took careful aim at his chest.

Storm didn't have time to think. All he knew was that Wits—his best friend in the world—was about to be shot. In a flash, Storm leaped in front of Wits as the Kiltish warrior pulled the trigger.

A shot rang out.

Storm felt something smash into his chest. Then the whole world went suddenly black.

"Storm... Storm! Snap out of it!"

A minute later, Storm was still lying on the ground where he had fallen. He slowly opened his eyes and saw Trina's face above him. He didn't feel any pain at all—not even in his chest.

"What happened?" Storm asked, sitting up on one elbow.

"You saved my life, Storm," Wits said, kneeling down beside his friend. "You jumped in front of a bullet and saved my life. Then Trina finished off the warrior with her crossbow."

"But you weren't shot with a normal bullet, Storm," Trina said. "You were shot with this!" She handed Storm a giant red jernerald. "I found it laying on your chest."

Storm's mouth dropped open in amazement. He grabbed the sword from the ground beside him, then carefully placed the red jernerald in the sword's hole. It was a perfect fit.

Suddenly, the sword began to speak.

"It was I who transformed a bullet made of lead into a magic red jernerald," the sword began. "For you were willing to give your life for a friend. And there is nothing greater in the world than this—nothing braver. Anyone who would give his life is worthy of my power."

Storm stood up. He felt the sword glow in his hands. A rush of energy pulsed up his arms and coursed through every cell of his body. Suddenly, a glowing powerball shot from the tip of the sword. The powerball struck a giant finger-tree, and the tree exploded into smoke.

Storm smiled.

"Let's go," he said. "It's time to rescue my dad."

Storm pushed away the leaves and peered through the branches of a pu-pu bush.

Down below, in a jungle clearing, stood Skuljagger's prison. It was a huge stone building, with a guard tower at each corner. From the towers, guards scanned the jungle with long binoculars. Storm counted about two hundred prison windows—and wondered how he'd ever find his father in time.

Not to mention how he'd get out alive.

"I think I should go in alone," Storm said, turning to Wits and Trina.

"Forget it...!" Wits and Trina started.

"I'm serious," Storm answered. "This is definitely a one-man job. And I need you both to keep watch. If the guards spot me, cry out like a claw-bird. That way, I'll know I'm in trouble."

Trina and Wits nodded reluctantly.

"Good luck, Storm," Trina said.

"Ingawa!" Wits said, slapping Storm on the shoulder.

Storm smiled, grabbed his sword, and set off.

At first, he stayed behind finger-trees, sneaking closer and closer to the prison walls. When the trees ran out, he crouched down and zig-zagged from pu-pu bush to pu-pu bush. Finally, he stopped behind a fence not more than thirty feet from an open window. If he could leap through that window, he'd be deep in the heart of Sküljagger's prison.

The only problem was, a Kiltish guard was marching back and forth in front of the window.

It all came down to perfect timing. Storm waited for the guard to turn around, then burst toward the prison. Just when the guard was about to turn back, Storm took a hop and a skip—then jumped head-first through the open window.

It was a perfect jump—except for one thing. On the way through the window, the sword clanged against the wall.

Storm tumbled to the floor inside, then sprang to his feet. Outside, he heard Wits and Trina call out like frantic claw-birds.

"Here we go again!" he said. He turned and ran into the hallway, slapping his leg in frustration.

The prison was cold and dim. Long stone hallways led off in all directions, lit by glowing torches. Storm had no idea where to go, so he made the first turn and rushed down a stairway.

The alarm bell sounded throughout the prison. Storm slid around a corner on one foot, and sprinted forward.

"There he is!" a group of Black-Masks shouted behind him.

Storm spun around and fired a power-ball from the sword. The power-ball exploded in front of the Black-Masks, sending up a sheet of flame which blocked the hallway.

"Yes!" Storm shouted.

He spun around a dark corner, flew down another flight of steps, and rushed toward an open doorway filled with light. As he approached the light, Storm heard Sküljagger's voice.

"I've been waiting all day to do this," Sküljagger laughed.

"Any last words, Coe Jaxon?"

Then Storm heard his father's voice call out, loud and strong.

"I did it all for Westica!"

Storm had never run faster in all his life. He slid to a stop in front of the door, just as Sküljagger lifted up his giant battle-axe. Coe Jaxon was kneeling on the ground, bare-chested, with his hands tied behind his back. No one else was in the execution chamber.

"Dad!" Storm screamed. He pointed the sword at Sküljagger and shot a power-ball.

Sküljagger spun his head around in time to see the shot, and ducked. But the power-ball hit his battle-axe and shattered it into a thousand pieces. Sküljagger dropped to the floor, dazed by the massive surge of energy.

Storm ran to his father, cut the ropes, and set him free. But Sküljagger was coming back to life. He shook his head like a stunned bear, and climbed slowly to his feet.

"Storm...!" Coe Jaxon exclaimed.

"We'll talk later, Dad," Storm said. "It's time to run."

They sprinted out the door and ran down the hallway, with Sküljagger following right behind. The prison was a mass of confusion. Storm knew that if they could make it to the back exit, they stood a chance of sneaking out alive.

"That's my sword!" Sküljagger screamed. "I must have it back!"

Warriors and sailors and Black-Masks chased them up the stairs and down the torch-lit halls, hurling chains and firing rifles. Storm spun around and fired off a couple of powerballs—but they sailed wide and missed their targets.

"Head for that door, Dad," Storm yelled.

They rushed out the door and into the blinding light of day. Storm jumped on a barrel and aimed the sword at a huge white pillar, which held up a stone balcony. He had to shoot the pillar with seven power-balls before it collapsed—completely blocking the door. Storm could hear the Kiltish warriors yelling behind the mass of rubble, trapped.

A split-second later, Storm and his father disappeared into the jungle. They met Trina and Wits behind a pu-pu bush and—without saying a single word—ran off toward Tuscamesh.

After sneaking silently past Kiltish jungle patrols, the four rebels stopped to rest by a clear blue stream. Evening was fading, and all around them the jungle dissolved into darkness.

"Well...!" Coe Jaxon said, bending to drink the water. "I guess you proved me wrong, Storm. You are old enough to help. You three saved my life."

Storm blushed with pride.

"All three of you should have come along on the Mask Day Rebellion," Coe Jaxon said. "You can never have too much bravery."

"Uh..., Dad, about the Mask Day Rebellion...", Storm began, wearing a little grin. "I was actually..."

The sound of distant gunfire interrupted Storm mid-sentence, and everyone stopped short. Coe Jaxon cocked his ear toward the sea, heard more gunfire, and pulled the three friends together.

"Listen up," Coe Jaxon began. "As you know, an army of Westicans is gathering at the lighthouse near the village of Siksups. While I was in prison, I overheard the Kiltish battle-plan.

Sküljagger is going to attack at dawn. I'm heading there now, to warn them."

Coe Jaxon turned to Wits and Trina.

"You two, run into the countryside and make sure all able-bodied Westicans get to the lighthouse. Storm, you run to Tuscamesh and do the same. Take the short-cut across the old piers and bridges—but keep an eye out for Black-Masks. Tell the people we need all the fighters we can get, if we're planning to wage war against Sküljagger!"

Storm nodded and sprinted into the darkening jungle, his fists clenched, his jaw set tight.

"The fun's just beginning," Storm muttered to himself.

Storm met Black-Masks and warriors along the piers that led to Tuscamesh, and the comet-like flash of power-balls streaked through the Westican night. When Storm had cleared a path before him, he ran with all the strength of a seasoned soldier—to carry the message of battle to Tuscamesh.

Every able-bodied fighter in Tuscamesh needed to know about the plan.

And they need to get to the lighthouse—fast.

Storm was the only soul on Claw-bird Road.

As he ran across the cobblestones, his boots echoed through the streets as if he were in an empty cavern. On a normal evening, Claw-bird Road would have been bustling with jemerald miners and Kiltish warriors and farmers pushing fruit carts home from market. But tonight, every window was shuttered, and every door barred tight.

A window flung open above him.

"What are you doing out there, Storm?" a woman whispered.

"Mrs. Oboschnozkobov!" Storm said, screeching to a stop. "I'm carrying a message. Everyone who can fight should hurry to the lighthouse, now! Sküljagger's going to attack at dawn."

"Didn't you hear?" Mrs. Oboschnozkobov whispered.

"Sküljagger put all of Tuscamesh on military alert. Anyone found in the streets will be shot on sight. No questions asked."

Mr. Oboschnozkobov appeared in the window behind his wife.

"Thanks for the message, Storm!" he said, pulling on his coat. "I'll see you at the lighthouse!"

Storm turned and ran down the street, knocking on doors and spreading the word. As the message got around, he saw Westicans slip out of back doors, sneak down alleys, and disappear into the thickets of the jungle. The lighthouse was only two miles away—but those two miles were patrolled by the Kiltish. Every few minutes, Storm heard gunfire in the distance. He could only hope that most of the Westican rebels made it to the lighthouse alive.

Storm zig-zagged down the alley-ways, leaping over barrels and crates. By now the moon had risen, and he figured it was time to get to the lighthouse. But as he ran through Tuscamesh, he yelled at the top of his voice.

"Everyone meet at the lighthouse! And bring all the weapons you have!" Storm screamed, as he left behind the final buildings of Tuscamesh, and ran headlong into the nighttime jungle.

The Westican army—if you could call it an army—was camped in the darkness near the lighthouse. It was a rag-tag collection of farmers and shop-keepers—with a few young boys and white-haired old men thrown in for good measure. They didn't have wood for campfires, or even food for a simple dinner. All they had were pitchforks, scythes, old crossbows—and a burning desire to be free.

Storm could see the Kiltish campfires in the distance. It seemed as if a thousand orange flames were dancing in the night. And Storm knew that five Kiltish warriors—maybe more—were standing beside each fire... and that each of those warriors had enough food and ammunition for a month-long campaign. Every once in a while, Storm heard the sound of snarling Kiltish battle-dogs. He even heard the sound of laughter drift toward him on the wind.

But there was no laughter on the Westican side. Every able-bodied man was busy digging a long deep trench—to prepare for the attack that would come with the first light of dawn.

That night, Storm was digging beside Wits, Trina, and Coe Jaxon. As he worked, Storm told his father about the sword.

"On the night you were captured," Storm said, tossing a shovel-full of dirt over his shoulder, "I heard this voice down in the locksmith shop. When I went downstairs, I found the sword, glowing in my drawer. And the sword told me its whole story. See, it's the voice of the King of Urnum. And Urnum was this ancient civilization that had incredible weapons—but it destroyed itself. The ruins of the lost city of Urnum are somewhere on Westica. And some of the amazing weapons are still in the ruins. And the King also said that..."

Wits dropped his shovel. "Storm!" he shouted. "It's so simple! Why didn't I think of this earlier? All we have to do is find the ruins of Urnum, and we can grab all the weapons! Then we can destroy the Kiltish."

"Yeah...", Storm said, getting excited.

"Sorry, men," Coe Jaxon said. He pointed to the eastern sky, which was turning light with dawn. "There's no time. The Kiltish will be attacking soon. We can't have you tramping all over Westica, searching for some lost city." Coe Jaxon lifted his binoculars to his eyes, and gazed toward the distant fires.

"I can see the Kiltish getting into position now. We'll need every last person here, to fight."

Storm got back to work. A few moments later, a battle-cry pierced the dawn. The Kiltish Army held their long battle-banners aloft in the wind. Captain Sküljagger was in front, wielding a sword and a giant battle-axe. Storm felt a chill of fear shoot up his spine. Sküljagger let out a scream, and the whole long line of Kiltish warriors began marching slowly toward them.

Storm knew that the Westican army was in a bad position. The ocean was behind them. Even now, Storm could hear waves crashing against the rocky beach. And in front of them was the mighty Kiltish Army, closing in.

The Westicans were trapped in the middle.

"Everyone into battle position!" Coe Jaxon cried out.

All the Westicans dropped their shovels and picked up their weapons. They lined up along the half-finished trench, stared out over the top—and waited.

"Storm, there's something I want to tell you, before the battle starts," Coe Jaxon said, taking Storm by the shoulders. "A week ago, I would never have allowed you to be here. I would have said you were too young. But you've proven that you're worthy, and I'm proud of you." Coe Jaxon turned his head and gazed across the empty field. "Now get ready, Storm. Here they come."

The Kiltish broke into a trot, screaming as they advanced across the battlefield. The soft light of dawn was reflected in their steel masks and sharpened bayonets.

The first cannonball whistled past Storm's ears and exploded in the dirt behind him. Then a thousand rifles fired at once, raining the Westican trenches with bullets. Storm fired a power-ball from his sword, and watched a warrior disappear in a cloud of smoke. The Kiltish kept advancing, one man after the other. Storm glanced down the trench and saw that some Westicans had already fallen. He turned back to the battlefield, and released another power-ball. The shouts of battle grew louder.

"Storm, watch out!" Wits screamed.

Storm spun around just in time to see a warrior charging at him from the side. Storm shot a power-ball but it sailed above the warrior's head. The warrior lunged at Storm with his bayonet. Storm fell back against the trench in terror, ready for a desperate duel.

But an arrow pierced the Kiltish armor just in time—and the warrior crumpled into the trench.

Storm looked over to Wits.

"I owed you one, Storm," Wits said, with a little nod.

The Kiltish advanced, inch by inch. They shot their rifles, reloaded, moved forward, and shot again. Some Westicans leaped from the trench, and fought the Kiltish hand-to-hand. The air was filled with screams, gunfire, smoke, and the sound of metal against metal. Cannonballs continued to bombard the Westican line, spraying deadly shrapnel through the trenches.

Storm peppered the battlefield with power-balls. Next to the massive Kiltish cannons, Storm's sword was the most fearsome weapon on the battlefield. The sword's red fire-balls of energy sliced through the air, spinning toward their victims with a sound like a flaming forge.

And yet, Storm wished the sword could do even more. He wished it could cover the entire battlefield with fire, and silence the Kiltish cannons with a single giant flame-ball.

"Faster, faster!" Storm shouted at the sword, trying to shoot more and more power-balls. "Come on, sword! Shoot faster!"

"Storm!" the sword said, in its deep and powerful voice, "My powers are limited. You must be brave!"

After a half-hour of heavy hand-to-hand fighting, the tide of the battle began to turn. Storm saw Kiltish warriors fall to Westican arrows, pitchforks, and swords. The raw courage of the rebels began to push the Kiltish back—inch by inch.

"The Kiltish didn't expect this, did they?" Trina said, grinning as she placed another arrow in her crossbow.

Just then the Kiltish horn sounded for retreat, and all the warriors spun on their heels and ran for camp. A shout of triumph rose from the Westican trenches. Storm lifted his sword and let out an enormous whoop.

But Coe Jaxon was not celebrating. "They'll be back," he shouted down the trench. "And they'll be back with battle-dogs, cannons, and twice as much fire-power. You can count on that." He threw down his crossbow and picked up his shovel. "Everyone who's not tending the wounded, get back to work on the trench. This battle is not over yet!"

A soldier came running through the trenches.

"Coe!" the soldier said, out of breath, "A unit of Black-Masks has captured the lighthouse! They're setting up sniper positions in the windows!"

Storm turned to look at the ancient lighthouse, which had been built by an early Westican leader, U.D. Elar. It was a tall, thin building topped with a spinning spotlight. For three hundred years it had guarded the rugged coast near Siksups, and its rough Westican stones were battered from sea-storms. If a unit of Black-Masks got control of the tower, they could trap the Westican army in a deadly crossfire.

"I'm going in," Storm said, leaping over the trench. "Someone's got to take care of those Black-Masks."

"Wait, Storm!" Coe Jaxon began. "That's pretty dangerous work. I think you'd better stay here and..."

"Dad," Storm interrupted, "Today you told me that I'd proved I was worthy—and that means I can make my own decisions." Storm gripped his sword. "And I've decided to take out those Black-Masks."

Coe Jaxon smiled, raised his hand and said, "Ungawa!"

"That's ingawa, Dad," Storm laughed, slapping his father's hand as hard as he could.

He inched down the hall of the lighthouse, keeping his back to the stone wall. In the stairwell up ahead, Storm could see the dark outline of a Black-Mask sentry. The sentry's rifle-barrel glinted in the light from an open window.

For the first time that day, Storm felt scared.

He passed by a window, and glanced down at the Westican countryside far below. A giant volcano—called Lilidar's Cap—rose above the jungles, sending a wisp of vapor from its crater. The Updown Mountains marched inland, like a massive army of stone. In the distance, Storm could see the buildings of Tuscamech glowing in the warm morning sun.

Suddenly he remembered what all the fighting was for. "Westica!" he whispered, and courage flowed through him like fire.

Storm took a step, and the floorboard creaked.

"Hey..." the sentry shouted, spinning and lowering his rifle.

But Storm shot first. The power-ball spun down the hall and struck the top of the doorway. Stones came crashing down on top of the sentry.

"So much for sneaking upstairs," Storm muttered, as the sound echoed through the building.

Storm heard Black-Mask snipers running across the floor above him. He ducked behind a wall, just as the Black-Masks rushed down the steps.

"There he is!" they shouted, squeezing off rounds from their massive rifles. The bullets shattered Storm's wall, and he squinted in the flying debris.

Storm was trapped.

"He's got the captain's sword!" a Black-Mask cried.

Storm noticed the white pillars that held up the lighthouse's roof. He jumped onto a dark brown crate, aimed at the white pillar in the corner, and shot a power-ball.

"Come on, sword," Storm said, shooting again. "Faster!"

On the fifth power-ball, the white pillar finally collapsed. Then the roof began to buckle, and stones tumbled from above.

"See you guys later," Storm shouted, as he rolled across the floor to the top of the next stairwell. He leaped down the steps in a single, graceful bound—followed by a stream of Kiltish bullets. Landing with a thud, he did a somersault, then ducked down beside a barrel.

The ceiling collapsed on top of the Black-Masks, with a sound like roaring thunder. The whole lighthouse shook, as if it were made of flimsy wood. Storm covered his head, closed his eyes, and ducked. But the ceiling above him held firm—and Storm fell back against the wall, happy just to be alive.

A moment later, the sword's voice broke the sudden silence.

"You are a brave soldier," the sword said. "Very brave. But bravery is not enough. Your nation is in danger of losing the war. You must listen to me, if you wish to survive."

Storm sat up and held the sword, still breathing hard.

"I will help you find the lost city of Urnum," the sword said.

"If you are strong—and lucky—you may discover Urnum before the Kiltish destroy your army, and burn your houses to the ground."

"I can't leave the battle," Storm said firmly. "The Westicans need me—and you."

"As you wish," the sword said. "It is your decision, and yours alone."

Storm sighed, then glanced out of the window toward the sea. Suddenly his heart skipped a beat. Two massive Kiltish battleships were approaching the coast under full sail. In a few hours, they'd be within easy firing range of the Westican army.

Storm tossed a piece of homemade gum into his mouth and blew a green bubble.

"Visitors," he muttered. "They always show up at the wrong time."

At four o'clock that afternoon, the Kiltish attacked.

A fire-storm of cannonballs crashed in from the battleships, splintering the Westican trenches. This time, the Kiltish troops were led by an army of two-headed battle-dogs. The fierce Kiltish dogs—with powerful jaws and terrifying snarls—ripped through the Westican lines like demons.

The Westicans were finally feeling the full measure of Sküljagger's wrath. And Storm was beginning to worry.

"Dogs!" Trina screamed, falling back against the dirt as a battle-dog leaped across the trench, its jaws snarling and dripping. Storm wheeled around and vaporized the two-headed beast—just as it was about to sink its teeth into Trina's neck.

But there were simply too many battle-dogs, too many cannonballs, too many warriors, too many Kiltish bayonets.

After an hour of battle, the Westicans fled for their lives to the rocky beach behind the lighthouse. The darkness of night was the only thing that saved the rebels from final destruction.

"Darkness only lasts till morning," Coe Jaxon shouted, as the Westican army dug in. "Tomorrow, we're going to have to fight for our lives."

Things looked bad.

Extremely bad.

Out at sea, the battleships swayed against the moonlit sky. Inland, Storm could hear the rumble of artillery rolling into place. Once again the orange fires of the Kiltish Army dotted the battlefield, and the sound of snarling battle-dogs drifted in on the breeze. And once again the Westicans had no wood for fires, no food for their hungry soldiers.

The Westicans were trapped. Without a miracle, the rebel army could not survive another day of battle.

"I'm going to Urnum," Storm said, gripping the sword. "I got Westica into this mess, and I plan to get her out."

Wits and Trina looked at each other and shook their heads. It was typical Storm Jaxon. How could anyone expect to sneak through the Kiltish lines, plunge into the dark jungles, discover the ruins of a lost city, and bring back an arsenal of ancient weapons—all by the next morning?

If anyone could, Storm could.

5 the TRIP to URNUM

*T*he ruins of Urnum lie in the crater of the great volcano."

Storm couldn't believe his ears. "What did you say?" he asked, gazing at the sword.

The sword answered in a voice as strong as the crashing waves. "The ruins of Urnum lie in the crater of the great volcano."

"Do you mean the volcano we call Lilidar's Cap?" Storm asked. He sent a worried glance toward Wits and Trina.

"Yes," the sword answered.

"But that's impossible," Wits said, stepping forward. "You can't build a city in a volcano. It would be burned to a crisp."

Storm, Trina and Wits were crouched in a cave near the beach. All around them, the Westican army slept in the sand. In a sad voice, the sword told them the story of Urnum.

"We learned to harness the power of the great volcano," the sword began. "And I, as King, could have turned that power to good use. Under my rule, the whole world might have prospered. But, instead, I only wanted to increase my own power. And because of my greed, I brought my people—and the whole world—to terrible destruction."

Suddenly, Storm felt the sword grow cold in his hand.

"You're freezing," Storm said, tossing the sword to his other hand. "What's wrong?"

"You must understand," the sword answered. "I have not returned to Urnum for five thousand years. There will be ghosts in the streets, and spirits in the ruins. Creatures will attack and torment me. For I caused incredible destruction."

"Maybe we shouldn't go," Trina said, turning pale.

"You must go!" the sword answered. "It is your only hope."

Storm glanced at his friends. Trina was pale. Wits' hands were shaking.

"Maybe I should go alone," Storm said. "You two can stay here and help with...."

"Not a chance!" Wits said, trying to look courageous.

"I wouldn't miss this for the world," Trina added.

Storm smiled. "Ingawa!" he said.

"Ingawa!" Trina and Wits answered.

The three friends sneaked through a rocky ravine that cut right through the middle of the Kiltish lines, careful not to make a single sound. Once, Trina slipped on a stone and started a small avalanche—but the Kiltish didn't seem to hear a thing.

As soon as they entered the jungle, they took off running along an old worn path—until the sound of the sea had faded, and the Kiltish fires had disappeared.

They stopped by a stream, out of breath.

"I'm starting to get a strange feeling," Trina said.

"Uh-oh," Storm said, stopping short. "It's Trina's sixth sense."

"Someone's following us," Trina said.

"Following us?" Wits asked. "Who?"

"No one's following us," Storm said. "We've been running for ten minutes, and we haven't heard a thing."

"Maybe there are bladebacks around here," Wits said, pulling an arrow from his quiver. "Maybe that's who's following us."

"Maybe...." Trina answered.

They started walking through the pitch-dark jungle, their ears alert to every sound. Storm had never been to this part of the Westican wilderness. It was called the Lost Jungle, because anyone who traveled there got lost—and usually ended up as a quick dinner for a hungry bladeback.

The jungle was quiet, except for the distant screeching of giant insects. Storm had heard tales of strange beasts that inhabited the Lost Jungle. But he didn't believe them. Or at least he didn't want to believe them.

The sword's voice broke the silence. "Leave the path, and enter the jungle. Turn right toward the finger-tree, then three lefts and another right. There you will find a bridge across a raging river."

They left the path and walked quietly through the jungle, following the sword's directions. Finally they arrived at the edge of a gorge. At the bottom of the gorge was a raging river.

"Here's the bridge!" Trina cried.

Storm felt his face go pale. It was a high, thin, rickety bridge made of rope and wood. Trina tested the rope with a tug.

The rope began to fray, and almost snapped in two.

"No one has crossed this bridge in five thousand years," Wits said. "We'll definitely need stronger rope."

"Hey, you're the genius, Wits," Storm said. "You figure it out."

Wits disappeared into the jungle. A minute later, he returned with an armful of finger-tree moss. Storm and Trina watched in amazement as Wits wove the moss into a long, thin rope.

"Do you think it'll be strong enough?" Trina asked.

Wits just shrugged. "I guess we'll cross that bridge when we come to it."

Storm rolled his eyes. He snatched the rope from Wits' hands, tied it around a tree, and stepped out onto the bridge. The bridge swung wildly back and forth, and up and down, and Storm almost tumbled into the river far below. But he caught himself, and began to wrap the new rope around the old.

Wits and Trina followed right behind, inch by inch.

When they were halfway across the bridge, a screaming sound came down from the sky.

"Flying monkeys!" Storm shouted, ducking as a monkey buzzed his head. The beasts had razor-sharp claws which unfurled to snatch their prey.

Storm saw a swarm of monkeys in the sky above. He aimed the sword and shot a power-ball. The flame streaked through the night, and exploded like a bomb in the center of the swarm. The monkeys fell from the sky and disappeared into the mists of the raging river.

"Behind you!" Trina shouted.

Storm spun around and plugged a monkey in the chest, just as it was about to sink its claws into his back. The monkey screamed and vaporized in a flash of fire.

Another swarm of monkeys appeared in the sky, and the three friends took off across the bridge. As their feet pounded the planks, Storm felt one of the old ropes start to break. The bridge began to tilt, and they slid toward the edge.

"It's breaking!" Wits screamed. "Jump for the other side!"

They leaped just as the rope snapped and the bridge gave way beneath them. Storm slammed against the wall of the gorge, and grabbed hold of a thin tree with his one free hand. But Wits fell short, pawing desperately at thin air. At the last moment, he grabbed Storm's ankle—and hung above the deep gorge.

Trina landed safely on the other side. She snatched the sword from Storm's hand, dropped it to the ground, and began to pull on Storm's arm.

"Hurry Trina!" Wits shouted, squeezing Storm's leg with all his might, "I'm starting to lose my grip!"

Storm began to sweat. His fingers were about to break. And worst of all, he knew Trina wasn't strong enough to pull both him and Wits to safety.

"I can't hold on anymore!" Storm screamed.

His hand slipped off the tree trunk. Storm and Wits dropped toward the raging river, screaming.

Suddenly Storm felt an incredible force take hold of him. He stopped falling, as if he were connected to a giant spring. A blue bolt of energy snaked around him and Wits, raised them up, and set them gently on the ground.

The three friends stood there, gazing at the sword, their faces stunned and pale. The blue power-bolt that had saved their lives vanished into the sword's tip. Storm tried to say something, but he couldn't think of the right words.

The sword spoke instead. "I believe that you are doing what is right and good. I only wish that I had done the same, when I was King of Urnum. But be forewarned. My powers are limited. I cannot defeat Sküljagger. That is your task."

Storm picked up the sword. The handle was warm to his touch.

"Look to the sky," the sword said.

In the east, dawn was breaking. In a matter of hours, the Kiltish would open fire on the trapped Westican army.

"Let's go," Storm said, as he turned and rushed into the jungle. "We've got to get to the volcano—and fast!"

After a long march, the three friends came to a clearing in the jungle. The ruins of a giant fort sat in the center of the clearing, glowing in the first dim light of day. There were enormous stairways, walls, fallen pillars—and everything was made of crumbled stones. At the front gate, a huge tiki-statue stood guard. Its eyes seemed to follow them as they walked.

"This fort must have protected Urnum," Wits said. He pointed up an old road that led through the ruins, and then curved up the steep volcano. "See, this road leads straight to the lost city."

"Just think," Storm said, his eyes bright with amazement, "We're the only three people to have stood here in five thousand years."

It wasn't hard to imagine what the fort might have been like, five thousand years before. Storm could almost see the mighty warriors of Urnum marching down this road in long straight columns, their silken banners rippling. And he could almost see the King himself—a bearded man in a long robe and a crown made of jemerals—standing atop a tower as his troops marched off to sea.

Storm heard a sound behind him. He spun around, but the ruins were perfectly still, perfectly dark. Only a claw-bird cried in the lonely distance.

"Let's get out of here," Storm said, gulping. "This place definitely gives me the creeps."

The road left the ruins and began to rise steeply up the side of the volcano. They climbed and climbed, and soon they were high above the jungle. Far below, they could see the light-house, and the battleships just offshore. They could see the Kiltish Army moving into position on the rocky beach.

And they could see the tiny Westican forces hiding in their shallow trench.

"We've got to hurry," Storm said, climbing higher and higher.

Just then they heard a terrible screech in the sky, and an enormous shadow covered them.

It was a giant green bird—and it was angry.

Storm spun around, aimed the sword, and shot a power-ball. The ball smashed against the bird's breast and exploded—but the bird kept coming, unhurt.

The sword's voice rang out. "The bird is too powerful. Save yourself, Storm! The bird only wants me!"

Trina and Wits ducked behind a boulder, but Storm tripped and fell back against the path. The enormous bird swooped down, its talons opened like hungry jaws. Storm shot another power-ball, but the ball exploded harmlessly against the creature's mighty armor. The wind from the its massive wings blew Storm's head back, and its talons came closer to his face.

Storm screamed and covered his eyes.

But the bird didn't touch him. It only yanked the sword from Storm's hand and flapped away with slow, powerful strokes of its giant wings.

As it rose, it let loose a triumphant cry.

Storm watched the bird—and the sword—rise into the blue sky, then disappear into the top of the crater.

"Are you OK?" Trina said, rushing over to Storm.

"I'm fine," Storm said, standing up and brushing the dust off his pants. "Except for one thing."

"What's that?" Wits asked.

"I want my sword back,"

Storm answered.

He turned up the path and rushed toward the crater of the great volcano.

The truth was, Storm was actually worried about the sword.

If there was one place where the sword was not welcome, that place was Urnum. Thousands of angry ghosts still haunted the ruins of the lost city. And each one wanted nothing more than to seize the sword—and make the King of Urnum suffer for his mistakes.

He was sure that the giant bird had been a guardian of the lost city, and that it would hand the sword right over to the angry spirits of Urnum.

Storm felt it more than ever.

He wanted his sword back.

Now.

6 The Lost City

Storm hoisted himself onto the first pillar, blew a bubble, and gazed down into the crater of the great volcano.

"Ingawa!" he gasped.

Trina and Wits climbed up beside him—and their eyes opened wide with astonishment.

The middle of the crater was filled with orange, boiling lava. But all along the crater's edge, strange brown lava rocks rose above the fiery murk. Across these rocks stretched the lost city of Urnum.

Shattered columns lined the empty streets. The walls of ruined temples, carved with bizarre tiki-faces, surged upward from the rock. Here and there, a few pillars stood where giant houses once had been. Storm could easily imagine that—many years ago—this place had been the beautiful capital of a great and mighty empire.

At the far edge of Urnum, flush against the crater wall, stood the largest building of them all. Broken pillars led the way to its grand entrance.

"That must have been the royal palace," Wits said. "I'll bet that's where all the weapons are."

"But where's my sword?"

Storm said.

They scrambled down the rocks and sprang onto the streets of Urnum. Streams of white smoke began to rise from the ruins. At first, Storm thought it was just smoke from the molten lava. But when the smoke started to scream and spin and fly, he knew exactly what it was.

"Ghosts!" Storm cried, pointing forward.

The ghosts screamed toward the palace, rushing down the streets like wisps of cloud blown by a fearsome wind. Storm stopped in his tracks and watched. The ghosts rushed to the palace door, where they wailed and spun around in a giant white swarm.

"I've got a hunch," Storm said. "I'll bet those ghosts have found the sword for us. C'mon!"

When he got closer to the palace door, Storm spotted the sword in the center of the swarm. The sword's golden handle and silver blade were both as white as snow.

Storm didn't hesitate. But as he ran toward the ghosts, Storm saw a shadow emerge from behind a pillar and rush toward the sword. Storm picked up his speed, but the shadow reached the sword first.

Amazed, Storm watched the shadow plunge into the swarm of ghosts. It grabbed the sword and swung it in giant circles around its head, shouting as it sliced the air. The ghosts screamed and scattered in all directions. When the last ghost vanished, the shadow turned to Storm with a burst of evil laughter, and held the sword high above its head. A beam of sunlight fell across the shadow's ghastly face.

It was Sküljagger.

Storm's eyes opened wide.

"Greetings, pig-slime," Sküljagger said. He swiped the sword through the air again. "Thank you for returning my sword. Little did you know you'd also be leading me straight to Urnum. Now please excuse me, ridiculous rodent. I've got work to do."

Sküljagger laughed, spun around, and disappeared through the palace door.

"After him!" Storm cried. "We can't let Sküljagger get hold of the weapons!"

The three friends entered the palace at a sprint. It was a vast and stony place—with stairways leading up to darkness, and long halls that connected one massive room to the next.

"I think he went this way!" Storm said, wheeling around a corner. He led Wits and Trina into a room with a giant window that looked out into the depths of the crater.

"It's the weapons room!" Wits said, stopping short. "We found it!"

Storm could hardly believe his eyes. The room was filled with strange bombs, rifles, missiles, and huge panels covered with complicated buttons and gauges. There were cannons of all sizes, but they didn't look like any cannons Storm had ever seen.

Wits bent over a giant cannon and began to study its complex control panel.

"These must be plasma-blasters," Storm said. "Can you figure out how to work this stuff, Wits?"

"No prob, Storm," Wits said, reaching toward a lever.

"Hands off, boy!" Sküljagger shouted, jumping up from behind a giant plasma-blaster. He lowered the blaster at Wits, adjusting the barrel with the push of a button. "Now why don't you three just move away from that plasma-blaster?" Sküljagger said. "Stand over there, against the window, and put your hands up—like good little boys and girls."

Storm, Wits and Trina stepped slowly away from Sküljagger, until they stopped against a giant window. They raised their hands in the air. Sküljagger grinned.

"You'll never get away with this, Sküljagger!" Storm said, his face turning red with rage. "Never!"

"Oh really?" Sküljagger said. The Captain's one good eye narrowed into an angry slit, and he lifted up the sword. "Ever since I found this sword in a jernerald mine, I've been searching for the lost city of Urnum. But I never found the city, because I never earned the sword's full power. But you, Storm Jaxon. You earned the power of the sword for me!"

"How did you find us?" Storm asked, his blood boiling.

"It was almost too easy," Sküljagger answered. "I saw you sneaking through my lines last night. You were so careful not to make a sound—just like little kids playing soldiers.” Sküljagger threw his head back in laughter. “All I did was follow you. Where else would you be going on the night before your final battle?”

Sküljagger looked around the weapons room, like a man who had just discovered a city of gold. “And now...I have all the weapons I need to rule the world!”

Storm knew they were in trouble.
Deep trouble.

If Sküljagger grabbed all the weapons of Urnum, he could destroy the Westican army in the blink of an eye. And then he could destroy the Kiltish Empire itself, and make the entire world his own.

Suddenly the rumble of cannons rose from the shore below, like the sound of distant thunder.

“Do you hear that lovely sound?” Sküljagger said, smiling and cupping his ear. “That’s our Kiltish cannons. We’ve started bombing your pathetic Westican army. In an hour, there won’t be a Westican soldier left alive!”

But Storm heard another sound as well. He listened closely. The noise came from deep inside the palace. It sounded like a whole mob of people screaming and running. The sound got closer and closer, louder and louder.

Suddenly a giant cloud of ghosts burst through the door and streaked toward Sküljagger. Sküljagger swung the sword back and forth through the air, but the ghosts began to circle around him like a swarm of furious bees.

Storm saw his chance. He sprinted to the plasma-blaster, and started punching every button he could. “Wits!” he shouted. “How do I fire this thing?”

Storm finally hit the red button, and the ancient plasma-blaster came to life. A red blast shot out and exploded right at Sküljagger’s feet, ripping a giant hole in the floor. Sküljagger’s right foot slipped into the chasm, and he swung his arms madly to keep his balance.

"AAAHHH! I'm falling!!" Sküljagger screamed, as the ghosts spun around his head. He snatched desperately at the ghosts, as if he could grasp them and break his fall. But the ghosts were like a fog, and Sküljagger's hands slipped through them. The Captain's face writhed in terror as he fell slowly back. At last he flung the sword into the air, and plunged screaming into the chasm.

"The sword!" Storm shouted, leaping toward the black hole. He snatched the sword's handle, then skidded to a stop an inch from the edge.

Storm gripped the sword tightly, and looked down. He saw Sküljagger tumbling into darkness, his cape floating up around him. The ghosts still swarmed around the Captain's falling body. A scream rose up from the black hole. "Storm Jaxon, I'm going to...." But the scream got quieter and quieter. Finally it vanished altogether, and Urnum fell silent.

Storm looked back at Wits and Trina.

"Ingawa!" Wits said, breaking into a smile.

"Sküljagger's gone!" Trina shouted, running over to give Storm a hug. "And he's gone for good!"

Storm took a deep breath and shook his head.

"Wow!" he said. "Was that close, or what?"

But the three friends didn't have time to celebrate. Down below, the Kiltish cannons were ripping apart the Westican trenches, and the Kiltish army was preparing for their final attack. In a matter of minutes, the Westican army would be destroyed.

"We've got to figure out how to get a blaster down to the battlefield," Storm said.

He glanced around the room, then slapped the wall in frustration. It seemed like an impossible task.

The sword spoke out. "Look to the map, and be brave."

"The map!" Wits said, pointing to a giant map of Westica on the wall. There were red buttons all over the map, on every bay and river and mountain. "Maybe if I push this red button...." Wits pushed one of the buttons that sat exactly where the lighthouse was. "I wonder what it...."

A piece of the stone wall slid open. A metal track appeared, and dropped down the edge of the volcano toward the Westican jungle. One of the small plasma-blaster jerked, then began to roll along the track.

"Catch that blaster, fast!" Storm cried, jumping on. "Let's hope this track leads us to the battle!"

Trina and Wits scrambled onto the weapon just as it dropped toward the jungle far below.

"YEEEEEOOWW!!!" the three friends shouted. The blaster shot like a bullet down the track, and Storm felt his stomach drop into his shoes. Their hair was standing out straight behind them and the wind brought tears to their eyes. The blaster raced at a hundred miles an hour—straight down the side of the volcano—and all they could do was scream.

They took a sharp turn toward the jungle.

"We're going to crash into the trees!" Wits shouted.

They entered the jungle with a whoosh of air, turning quickly around mountains and missing trees by an inch. The track rose out of the jungle floor ahead of them, draped with dirt and moss. And the blaster just kept speeding forward.

"What's that?" Trina shouted, pointing ahead.

A giant fin-backed lizard was standing in the middle of the track, breathing fire and waiting to turn them into dinner. If they ran into the lizard, they'd all be smashed to bits.

Storm aimed the sword. He shot a power-ball and watched it zoom forward. The ball smashed into the flaming mouth of the lizard—and the giant beast vaporized with an eerie scream and a cloud of blue smoke.

A half-second later, the blaster plunged through the smoke and broke into the clear. Then it curved around a tree, banked around a mountainside, and veered off sharply toward the coast.

"Just one question," Storm said to the sword. "Where are we headed?"

The sword had just the answer they wanted to hear.

"To the lighthouse."

Storm lifted the sword above his head, and the three friends shouted in triumph as their blaster shot through the dense green jungle.

The Westicans were crumbling.

Two Kiltish battleships relentlessly pounded the trapped rebel army. At the same time, the Kiltish land forces were advancing quickly, taking more and more of the Westican beach. As the Kiltish moved forward, the Westicans retreated toward a bunch of old piers and docks that stretched out near the village of Siksup.

Annihilation stared them in the face.

And only a miracle could save them.

The plasma-blaster shattered through the jungle and sped toward the rocky beach. Storm could see the lighthouse up ahead, surrounded by the smoke of a hundred cannons. Over the sound of gunfire, Storm could hear the shouts and screams of battle.

"Hold on, everyone!" Wits shouted. "We're dropping!"

The speeding blaster dropped into a ravine, plunged straight toward the rocks, then banked away at the very last second. Storm felt his stomach drop. In all the noise and confusion of battle, the blaster slipped easily through the Kiltish lines. A few warriors noticed the strange contraption, but Storm took care of them with a couple of well-aimed power-balls.

The blaster finally curved onto the beach beside the lighthouse—and stopped right in the thick of battle.

"Duck, Trina!" Storm shouted, as a Kiltish warrior charged across the blaster, his bayonet before him.

Trina ducked just in time. The warrior tripped over her back and tumbled forward into the air. Storm vaporized him with a powerball before he even hit the ground.

"Storm! Wits! Trina!" Coe Jaxon shouted, swinging his arm back and forth. "It's too late! Retreat toward the docks!"

Storm pulled a lever on the plasma-blaster and threw it into reverse. The blaster jerked backward across the beach, its wheels throwing sand at the Kiltish. Storm steered the blaster onto a pier, then spun the barrel around and adjusted it up and to the right so it pointed straight at the Kiltish Army. On the beach before them, the Kiltish shouted with triumph and shook their rifles in the air.

All the Westicans gathered around the amazing machine.

"Is this from Urnum?" Coe Jaxon asked. "Does it work?"

"Of course it works," Storm answered. He pushed the red button. Then he pushed it again.

But nothing happened.

A cannonball from a battleship exploded behind them, destroying a whole section of the pier, and sending fragments of wood and shrapnel through the air. The Westicans were trapped. Unless the blaster started working—and soon—defeat was just a matter of minutes away. Storm kept pushing the red button, harder and harder.

Suddenly the sword's voice boomed out from Storm's side. "Storm! You've got the trigger guard on! Take it off, and fire!"

"The trigger guard?" Storm cried, looking at all the controls.

"But which button is the trigger guard?"

"Try this one," Wits said, pushing a yellow button.

Suddenly a giant red plasma blast shot forth from the blaster. It hit the sand and exploded into fire, throwing three Kiltish warriors into the air like toy dolls.

"YES!" Storm said.

He fired off another plasma blast, and hit two Kiltish cannons head-on—leaving them a heap of smoking rubble.

The Kiltish weren't shouting with triumph anymore. They could tell that the tide of battle was about to turn.

"Storm!" Coe Jaxon said, rushing over. "Turn around and get those battleships! Their cannon-fire has been crippling us all morning. If we can sink the ships, then we've got a chance of pushing the army back!"

Storm spun the plasma-blaster around and shot a blast at the closest battleship. The red blast streaked across the water and smashed into the starboard hull. A giant explosion rocked the ship and snapped the main-mast. The proud Kiltish sails tumbled into heaps, and black smoke rose from the deck.

Storm turned the blaster and shot at the second battleship, further in the distance. The blast splintered through the wooden deck, and Storm saw barrels, cannons, and sailors go flying through the air. He aimed a little lower and fired another shot, punching a hole right at the water line. The mighty Kiltish battleship flipped on its side, and started to sink.

"YES!" Storm shouted, as a giant cheer rose up from the Westican army.

"Now let's take care of the army!" Coe Jaxon shouted, and a bolt of courage shot through the Westican ranks.

Storm spun the blaster around and fired another red plasma-blast. The explosion took out a sergeant and three warriors. The Kiltish pelted the Westicans with rifle-fire, but it didn't do a bit of good. The Westicans pushed forward—faster and faster.

"We haven't seen Sküljagger during the whole battle," Coe Jaxon said, pulling another arrow from his quiver. "I wonder if he's planning a surprise attack."

"I doubt that," Storm answered, as he shot another plasma-blast. "Sküljagger followed us up to Urnum, so he could get control of all the weapons. But we threw him down an endless pit—the scumbag—just like he deserved. I don't think we'll be hearing from old Sküljagger again."

Coe Jaxon smiled, gave Storm a thumbs up, then turned back to the battle. "Faster, men!" he cried. "Drive them off the beach!"

The Westicans drove the Kiltish all the way into Siksup, right near the lighthouse. The villagers had escaped into Tuscameash long before, and all the doors and windows were barred shut. The battle raged through the streets, with Storm leading the way.

The Westicans had the Kiltish on the run. They pushed the Kiltish all the way through the village and down toward a rocky beach. If they could trap the Kiltish army against the sea, the Kiltish would be forced to surrender or perish.

Storm could almost taste the sweetness of victory.

He fired off another blast, and watched the Kiltish turn to flee. The Westicans followed the Kiltish over a ring of giant boulders, then down onto the wide beach below. The Kiltish dug in near the water, and put up a wall of gun-fire.

But it wasn't enough to stop the Westicans.

Storm drove the plasma-blaster onto the beach, and took aim at the Kiltish. He smiled, and pushed the red button.

Nothing happened. His heart skipped a beat. He pushed the trigger guard, but that didn't work either.

"What's wrong?" Storm shouted at the sword.

"I do not know," the sword answered.

Storm shook his head. "Wits, help me fix this thing!" he shouted.

"Just keep pushing the red button," Wits said, fiddling with the complicated gauges. "Keep pushing till something happens."

Storm pushed the red button over and over, but nothing happened.

"Look!" Trina shouted, pointing up the beach.

Storm jerked his head around, and his mouth dropped open.

Another plasma-blaster—a giant plasma-blaster—was hurtling toward them on a shiny metal track.

And Sküljagger was at the controls.

"What the...!?" Storm cried, pushing the red button even faster. "But it can't be true!"

The huge plasma-blaster hit the shore and Sküljagger gunned it once then yanked it to a stop, throwing sand everywhere. He stopped right in front of the Kiltish Army, and turned the giant barrel toward the village of Siksups.

Sküljagger looked down across the battlefield. His face was burned and dirty, and his purple cape was ripped to shreds. Still, he wore a ghastly grin.

The entire battlefield fell silent. Storm stopped pushing the button, and just gazed across at Sküljagger, his face ashen.

"It's not so easy to get rid of Sküljagger!" the Captain shouted across the sands. "Just when you thought I'd be crushed, I used my cape as a parachute, and climbed up inch by inch from the lava pit! No one can stop Sküljagger!"

With that, he turned the barrel of his great plasma-blaster and fired at the village.

An enormous red plasma-blast flashed across the sky. A split-second later, the entire village exploded into flames. The flames leaped high into the air, and the whole Westican army was thrown to the ground. Sküljagger laughed and turned the barrel on Storm.

The Westican army climbed slowly to its feet. Everyone knew that now—after a day and a half of battle—the war was truly over. Sküljagger had them in the palm of his dirty hand.

"First, I shall vaporize you!" Sküljagger shouted across the beach. "Then I shall vaporize Tuscamesh, and every Westican worm who lives there! I promise you that I shall leave Westica nothing but a wasteland—a place where vultures come to feed. And then... with the weapons of Urnum, I shall rule the world!"

Storm felt his hands begin to shake. A bead of cold sweat ran down his side. He racked his brain, hoping to dream up some amazing plan.

"But if you don't want your island to be vaporized," Sküljagger continued, "Then I have an offer for you. I will spare Westica—and all of the people in it... but only under one condition."

Storm had a bad feeling.

"You must hand over Storm Jaxon," Sküljagger said, "And the sword he stole."

The Westican army gasped in outrage.

Storm stood up, and leaped down to the sand.

"Storm, don't go," Coe Jaxon said, grabbing him by the shoulder. "Sküljagger's a lying slug. He's not going to spare us, just because we hand you over. He's going to take your sword, and then vaporize the whole island anyway. Our only chance is to fight—and hope for a miracle."

Storm looked his father in the eye.

"You may be right, dad," Storm said. "But you may be wrong. Maybe Sküljagger will spare the island. This whole revolution is my fault. It all started when I stole Sküljagger's sword. Maybe if I give it back and..."

"But he's going to kill you!" Coe Jaxon said.

Storm nodded. "It's our only chance to survive."

Storm grabbed the sword and headed across the sands, alone. He kept his eyes fixed right on Sküljagger. He tried to make it seem like he wasn't scared—though his guts were churning and spinning inside. Sküljagger kept the barrel of the plasma-blaster aimed at Storm's chest.

"Stop right there, Jaxon," Sküljagger said, when Storm was twenty yards away. "Throw me the sword. NOW!"

Storm stopped. He gripped the sword more tightly in his hand, and brought his arm back. He heard the sword speak out—but so quietly that only he could hear it.

"Be brave," the sword whispered. "There may be good in Sküljagger yet."

Storm doubted it. He whipped his arm around and hurled the sword through the air. It flashed once in the morning sun, then sank point-first into the sand.

Sküljagger leaped from the blaster, and snatched the sword.

Storm kept walking forward, till he and Sküljagger were standing eye to eye.

"Here I am, Sküljagger," Storm said, opening up his arms.

"I'll even give you a nice clean shot. Just get it over with, and let my people live."

"Ha ha!" Sküljagger laughed, throwing his head back. "Did you really think I'd let Westica survive, after all the trouble you've caused! I just wanted the chance to eliminate you... all by myself."

Storm just kept staring into Sküljagger's one good eye.

"Any last words, Jaxon?" Sküljagger asked.

Storm didn't say a thing. He just kept staring.

The Captain raised the sword above him like a dagger.

Storm closed his eyes. His face contorted as Sküljagger plunged the sword-tip all the way through Storm's chest. The sword came out the other side.

Sküljagger laughed and pulled the blade back out.

But there wasn't a drop of blood on the blade.

In a flash, Storm realized what had happened. The sword had saved his life—again.

Storm ripped into action, swinging his foot at Sküljagger's face. His boot met Sküljagger's jaw and knocked the Captain's head back. Then Storm rammed his elbow into Sküljagger's stomach, and Sküljagger doubled-over. As the Captain's head flew down, Storm planted his knee in Sküljagger's face.

The sword flew from Sküljagger's hand, and Storm snatched it out of mid-air.

Stunned, Sküljagger staggered backward. He looked over his shoulder, and called for help from his warriors. But all the warriors stood as still as statues, gazing at Storm as if they were gazing at a ghost.

Without losing a beat, Sküljagger grabbed a dagger from his belt and lunged at Storm with all the fury of a battle-dog.

"Jaxon...!"

Storm instinctively thrust the sword toward Sküljagger's on-rushing chest. The instant the sword-tip touched Sküljagger's flesh, Storm was blinded by a giant explosion of light. He jumped back as the explosion turned into a plume of twisting, thick black smoke.

When the smoke cleared, a single gray rat was sitting on the sand.

The Kiltish Army gasped.

The rat squealed once, scampered between Storm's legs, and disappeared into the rocks.

Storm leaped onto Sküljagger's giant plasma-blaster, and spun it around so the barrel pointed right at the Kiltish Army.

"Throw down your weapons, and surrender!" Storm shouted. "Surrender now, or be vaporized!"

The Kiltish Army—stunned—threw down their weapons and raised their empty hands into the air. The Westicans rushed across the sand and grabbed all the Kiltish rifles.

For a moment, the battlefield was silent.

Storm climbed on top of the plasma-blaster, and raised his sword high.

"From this day on, I declare that Westica will be a free and independent nation!" Storm shouted. "Long live Westica!"

INSTRUCTIONS

The Controls:

- Y The "attack" button. Use Y to swipe the sword, shoot power-balls, and shoot while in battle perspectives. Also use it to pick up and throw objects. (To pick up an object, stand next to the object and hold Y; to throw the object, release Y.)
- X/A Both X and A activate the bubble gum power-ups.
- B The "jump" button.
- START Pauses and unpauses the game.
- L/R Use for key-strokes to enter secret Fantasy Zones. (Not LEFT/RIGHT on the Control Pad)
- LEFT Moves you left.
- RIGHT Moves you right.
- UP Use to climb ladders and ropes, enter battle perspectives, or float up with bubbles. Also use UP for key-strokes to enter secret Fantasy Zones.
- DOWN Use to crouch, climb down ladders and ropes, or float down with bubbles. Also use DOWN for key-strokes to enter secret Fantasy Zones.

The Objective: Move Storm Jaxon through the entire game and defeat Sküljagger at the end.

The Story: The Sküljagger story—found on pages 3–75—is packed with hidden clues. If you can figure these clues out, they'll help you find lots of secret things in the game.

Starting the Game: Insert the game pak into the Super Nintendo machine and turn on the power. Then select either ONE PLAYER START, TWO PLAYER START, PASSCODE, or BUBBLEGUM PRACTICE. Choose ONE PLAYER START or TWO PLAYER START to begin a new game. Choose PASSCODE when you have earned a passcode in previous play and want to jump forward quickly to more advanced Chapters. (You'll earn a passcode at the end of Chapters 1,2,3, and 4.) After the PASSCODE menu, choose either ONE PLAYER START or TWO PLAYER START and begin play. Choose BUBBLE GUM PRACTICE to learn how to use the gum power-ups.

Jemeralds: There are 4 kinds of jemeralds: red, green, blue, and giant blue. Collect a red jemerald and earn the ability to shoot power-balls from the sword. (You can collect up to 3 red jemeralds.) Collect 25 green jemeralds and earn an extra life. Blue jemeralds give you extra time on the timer and also function as place markers when you lose a life. A giant blue jemerald indicates the end of a map.

Lives: You begin the game with 5 lives. If an enemy touches you when you have any number of red jemeralds, you'll lose all of your red jemeralds. If an enemy touches you when you don't have any red jemeralds but you do have any number of green jemeralds, you'll lose all of your green jemeralds. If an enemy touches you when you have no jemeralds, you'll lose a life. You'll also lose a life when you fall off the screen or run out of time.

Defeating Enemies: You can defeat enemies by throwing objects at them, swiping the sword at them, shooting power-balls at them, or employing certain bubble gum power-ups against them.

Bubble Gum Power-Ups: There are 4 different types of bubble gum power-ups, each with a unique capability.

Snap-cherry: Lets you fly. Pump X or A to keep the bubble properly inflated. You lose the power-up when the bubble pops, or when you land. If you're touched by an enemy while this power-up is active, you'll lose this power-up but not a life.

Westican-orange: Lets you drop gum grenades for a few seconds. Press X or A to drop grenades. If you're touched by an enemy while this power-up is active, you'll lose this power-up but not a life.

Sea-grape: Makes you temporarily invincible. Press X or A to activate, then press B to jump, and UP and DOWN to bounce higher and higher.

Island-lime: Lets you clear the screen of enemies. Press X or A to activate.

Fantasy Zones: These are secret, bizarre-looking sections of the game which you can find by picking up certain objects, or by standing in certain spots and pressing the L, R, UP, or DOWN buttons in different combinations. Some fantasy zones are easy to find; others you will only find if you read the book and figure out clues. You cannot lose a life in a fantasy zone—if an enemy touches you, you'll simply return to the regular map.

Scoring: Points are awarded for collecting jemeralds, defeating enemies, and finishing maps.

Battle Perspective: These are areas of the game where you have the ability to shoot "into" the screen, at enemies in the distance. To enter a battle perspective, stand next to the weapon and press UP. Press Y to shoot, and UP and DOWN to aim. To exit, press either LEFT or RIGHT.

Ropes & Ladders: When necessary, you can jump onto a rope or ladder by pressing the B button (jump) and then UP. You cannot swipe the sword while on a rope or ladder. You can jump off a rope or ladder at any time by pressing the B button.

Status Bar Display: The top of each screen will display the following information: your player number and number of lives remaining, which bubble gum power-up you have (if any), the timer, how many green jemeralds you have (if any), how many red jemeralds you have (if any), and your point total. In the boss sections, an additional power meter will appear to indicate your progress against the boss.
